SPOTLIGHT ON SPORTS

By JACK KEENE

Mickey Walker, welterweight champion of the world, and Benjamin Leonard, king of the lightweights, are booked to swap punches on August 8 in Jersey City. Main interest in the battle centers, of course, in the fact that the lightweight king will have an opportunity to accomplish his lifelong desire, that of winning two flistic titles. He has rosy visions of some day being welterweight as well as lightweight champ.

The chance of his accomplishing this in the coming battle is lessened, however, by the fact that it is a no-decision affair. Mr. Leonard will have to seek Mr. Walker for a row of Atlantic City beach chairs to steal his jeweled chapau. This may happen, but there'll be little betting that it does. The first reason is that it will be Leonard's first fight in a year. No man as clever as Leonard is going to take a chance on his hands to land a knockout blow when he isn't sure of his distance. And Benjamin is also clever enough to realize that a man often lays himself open to a sock by trying to put the button punch over.

However, the fight should be interesting. It will give the fans a line on Leonard's physical condition, his weight, and what he can do against welterweights. The belief is general that Leonard, at fighting weight, is now a welterweight, so he will not be giving away much weight to the welter king. He will be meeting a champion, however, and what the psychological effect will be is problematical.

While Leonard has been idle Walker has fought quite often since mid-summer last year—the date of Leonard's last real fight. Before 1923 ended Walker had flattened Bobby Green and Max Herovitch and outpointed Jimmy Jones.

Since January 1 the welter has taken on several opponents, the most formidable one being Lew Tendler. That bout, staged this summer, gives about the only line on the comparative ability of the two kings. And that isn't much of a line. Leonard licked Tendler in 15 rounds in New York city. Walker outpointed Tendler in Philadelphia.

Leonard's general record, however, is much more impressive than that of Walker. Leonard fought his way to the title through a field of good little boys. He won the crown from one of the real masters of boxing, Freddy Welch, when he knocked that crafty warrior cold in the ninth round back in 1917. During his reign Leonard has met and defeated such formidable fighters as Pal Moran, Rocky Kansas, Joe Welling, Charley White, Johnny Dundee, Ritchie Mitchell, Pinky Mitchell, Sailor Friedman, Ever Hammer and Johnny Kibane, then featherweight champion.

Walker won his title from the crafty old Britton years after the shrewd one should have been out of the game. The venerable fighter had fooled Dad Time for many years with his craftiness and ring generalship when Walker, young, courageous, and with plenty of endurance, met him.

Britton's resourcefulness was not enough to stave off defeat. The class had been sadly lacking in worth-while opponents for Walker until of recent months. So, while he has fought fairly often, he has met second-raters mostly.

Walker is a good boxer, one of the brilliant boxers of the day. How he will look against a man as clever as Leonard, with the kick Leonard can put behind his punches, remains to be seen.

America can thank the men sending the athletic activities in the schools and colleges of the country for the wonderful showing the United States has made once more in the Olympic games. For there is no doubt but what the basis for the strength America develops for this quadrennial blue ribbon event is laid by these athletic tutors.

No other country in the world pays as much attention to the athletic training and teaching of its young student body as does America, and it is from the ranks of the educational institutions that the men who can turn back Europe's best in a majority of the international events are produced.

Another point which must be stressed in discussing the part the instructors at these institutions play in the development of our athletes is that effort is not directed primarily to producing the stars to shine ultimately in the spotlight of fame. Attention is laid first of all to teaching all students the technique of whatever branch of athletics they adopt.

"That which is worth doing at all is worth doing correctly" is their motto. That champions shall arise from the body of men so trained is of secondary consideration.

One result of this thorough ground-building done by the coaches and athletic directors is the development of a large number of brilliant men in every branch of sport each year. Many of these stars had no intention of becoming brilliant athletes when they first reported for that part of their school course. With knowledge of the sport and the success that followed in its wake came a desire to stand out in the ranks.

There is another pleasant feature connected with America's wonderful showing in the game. This is the evidence in the daily results that America has not slighted track and field athletics while paying homage to baseball and football as the two greatest sports from the standpoint of popular interest.

The same interest has prevailed in America regarding the success of Uncle Sam's team athletes abroad as centers around the annual world's series, the big football games, and the international ring bouts. True, there has not been quite as much hysteria, but the average reader has followed the fortunes of the cinder path and pit artists with close attention.

The men in charge of the selection of the squad which represented America and the men who directed the destinies of the lucky aspirants when they reached Paris, the scene of the games, deserve praise also. They chose and directed well. They went into the enterprise for the glory of Uncle Sam and filled their proteges with that spirit. Self was erased entirely.

Truly America can be proud of its athletes, represented by the Olympic stars, and of the men "behind the guns."
